Dieting is a big business here in the US, where every get thin quick diet or fad becomes the next big thing. The truth of it all is, if there was a quick way to be thin, I would have found it by now. Here's what I do know: WeightWatchers leads the way in sensible, successful weight loss programs. Their program is not a diet, but a way of retraining yourself about healthy ways to view food and your life-long relationship with food. This book is broken down in several sections and each section has stories that members have written in their own words. There are sections on losing weight for health reasons, for weddings, as a group, for men, etc. Each person's story then ends with a quote and a "take-away" thought, such as: plan your meals ahead of time (to avoid temptation later), don't make a one day error become a week-long failure, etc. I have not been a part of the WeightWatchers program, but a good friend and I started our weight loss journey together, she on the program, and me on my own. I lost a significant amount (over 40 lbs!) and have kept it off for coming up on three years. It all comes down to being accountable and planning. Although I am not on an organized plan, I do subscribe to their magazine, to follow the success stories and to keep myself on track and to continue to get good ideas for healthy eating and exercise. I especially love the success stories. If you like to read of other's successes and how you can incorporate this into your over-all fitness plan, this will probably be a book that you will find interesting. There are also areas at the end of each chapter to write-down ideas for yourself, such as in how to make healthy eating easier on the job, etc.
